

Would You Like to Write for Us?

The Review warmly welcomes articles on California legal history, particularly involving the California Supreme Court and the state's lower courts, the bar and the profession. We publish articles about the people, cases, and broader legal developments as they have affected our state, then and now.

Because we are a Review for a relatively broad audience, not an academic journal, please go easy on the legal jargon and citations. Most of our articles are in the 1000- to 2500-word range (although we're flexible on length), and illustrated with photographs and/or archival material (we'll handle that part). Submissions must be in Word.

Note to State Bar members: You can receive up to 12.5 hours of MCLE credit for "self-study," including time spent to research and write, as provided in the California State Bar Rules, Rule 2.83.

So please send me your ideas. And if you don't have an article in mind at the moment but would like to see your name in print, I'll happily give you an assignment.

Please query Review Editor at molly.selvin@gmail.com. I look forward to hearing from you.
